

If the girls were having something going on over at the seminary well, the boys would line up for the teachers to whip their demerits off. See them great big old boys, grown men, line up for spanking. Just to get to go over there. (Laughter) It wasn't an easy spanking either. Those teachers really lay it on. No, it sure wasn't. Those big old boys were talking whipping just to go to the seminary.

J. A. Tyner: Yeah, Paul Mitchell he was the one that did the whipping a lot of times. Tom Mitchell's brother. He was strong and could really lay it on. Jack Brown taught there the last couple of years when I was there, he graduated there then taught there. Yeah, I see him every time I go down there.

J. A. Tyner: Yeah, we do too. Didn't get to see him the other day. We finished in 1909.

Yeah. In 1909 and we go to his class and he taught Zoology I believe. Go to his class and old Andrews go to sleep and that would be my job to keep old Andrews awake. (Laughter) Andrews took me with the curiosity. You know that boy was never caught studying, but doggone if they didn't chase us for good grades. He made his grades right up there at the top.

J. A. Tyner: Went out and played roly hole that's about all he did.

Ed: Yeah. Out on the football field and everywhere else while everybody else was studying. He made grades about good as any of us.

(What was this rolyhole game?)

Well, they don't play rolyhole anymore. Used to make holes, I don't remember--one hole was over here and another over there and you stand over here at the starting point and you roll--used big marbles, role your marbles to that hole. When you get to that hole well, you roll to this other hole and then you go back. I don't remember much about it except--

J. A. Tyner: Well, I don't either. But I knew they played a lot of it then.

Ed: I know Joe was keen for it. A lot of us played rolyhole.

J. A. Tyner: I know somebody in Andrews class when they went to class one
