

(What did they get their water in, back then?)

They had these cedar buckets. Yeah, they were store-bought. Had cedar like slats, and they were brass-bound. That's what they carried water in.

(How big were the seed pods of that plant?)

About that long--two inches long--as far as I can recollect. And when they get ripe they crack open, and of course the seeds fall out when the breeze shakes them. And when the breeze hit a cluster of those open pods it just kind of had a musical sound. I know sometimes we'd hear it and it just was like a girl singing. Just plain.

(How big were the seeds that fell out?)

About as big--a little bigger than okra seeds. About that size --about the size of okra seed.

(Did they use the seeds for anything?)

No.

(End of Tape)