

out and them Utes looked around in the sheds and some hay--they looked under the haystack and in the house and they couldn't find her. But she was in that seat. And they was hitching them four horses to that stagecoach already. So the Utes left. They got on their ponies and went back over the hill and were standing around, looking. So this stagecoach started south, pretty near half a day's drive--no, not quite half a day's drive. Then they started east. "You see that cliff--that big white circle of tipis? That's the Arapaho camp." This woman started to sing, you know, and she holler for joy. So there was no road--they just bumped on this buffalo grass and there was just two of them--her and this man. So they got along about four or five miles, the way the story tells, and a young Indian came out, running, looking in all directions. He had no hat on--he just had a blanket. He was looking for ponies. So this stage driver stood up and took his hat and said, "Come here!" So this Indian boy looked around. "Come here." So he looked around--nobody. So he went over to this stagecoach. And this man asked this woman, "Do you know this boy?" She said, "I think I know him but I don't know his name." So he asked this boy, "Do you know this woman?" "I seen her a long time ago--I don't know her. She's Arapaho woman." Then this Arapaho woman told this boy, "I'm the one that was captured by the Utes. I stole away. I come to this stagecoach and they bring me here." He said, "I'll go back to camp and tell your folks. I know who you are." So this boy took a gallop back to camp and had the crier announce that they're bringing this Long Jaw--whatever it is--that was her Indian name. "She's coming with the stagecoach. So her people got together. Some of them start crying for joy, you know. Her brothers got on horseback and her father and mother. And this coach was coming. A whole bunch of them come out to meet them. They were out there and they were crying there in joy and happiness. And she got off and they hugged her and kissed her. And her mother told her, "Now this camp is for you. Your brother and your uncle, Club Foot, vowed to have this Sun Dance so you'd come home safe. Now that's what this Sun Dance is going to be. Now you're
