(It was White Bear's brother--?)

Yeah, Black Lodge.

(He's the one that rode by and shot--)

Yeah.

(Did the boy that was shot die?)

Oh yeah. He was killed.

(Did you ever hear what that quarrel was over?)

I never knew what the source of that trouble was.

(When these men were being selected to go as prisoners to Florida and they told off on each other, did this cause any hard feelings among the Indians?)

Well, mostly by the women. The men--ordinarily the Cheyennes knew that they were guilty of those charges. It was brought to bear that they were subjected (unintelligible phrase). And there were some Kiowas. I don't know if there were any Comanches, but there were some Kiowas. I think there was one of this Mrs. McElhaney's people (referring to Ioleta Hunt McElhaney). One of the Kiowas killed himself on the road. And a man by the name of Gray Beard, a Cheyenne, a story I heard from a Cheyenne was that he jumped out of the train during the movement of the train on the way out there. Some said he killed himself purposely. We've been told that he jumped out of the train. But they said they were good when they got there. As long as they were together the association was pretty friendly among the Cheyennes, you know. And they made a lot of friends. People would invite them to their homes. Of course when they ran out of their native costumes, then they had to resort to white man's clothing. But you know there's a funny story told about this. One time the same thing happened in Medicine Lodge. They gave them a whole supply of military clothes. Well, when they were issued those "pantaloons" as the army calls them, the Indians didn't know how to button them, you know. So they cut the seat off up
