

(You mean Attocknie bestowed it upon Kotay?)

Yeah, he bestow it upon this family. ze.ba¹¹edl bestow it to Attocknie, and Attocknie bestow that to--in 1912. His was bestowed in 1895. Somewhere in there. It was in 1912. Allie Coty had a daughter about 15 years old. Well, she's counted princess in the deal. And in order to have her princess, she has to be carried--never touch the ground from her home except to the ceremonial grounds where there's a blanket placed and that's the only place they could touch the ground. She's honored with a prince. And from Kotay's house, the ceremonial ground was almost half a mile--little over a quarter of a mile. And the ceremonial party marched to the home. I seen this. I think I seen Attocknie's, too, but I never saw this ze.ba¹¹edl ... but I have the souvenir saddle blanket of Ralph's (?) that I told you about that I had the picture of, and I'll show it to you next time. Now, this in 1912, the ceremonial party came from the ceremonial grounds and spectators all followed. There was about 500 people. They walked in a body to where this Kotay and his family were waiting to go to the ceremonial grounds. But the princess--the girl--cannot walk over there. She must never touch the ground. And she must be sitting on top of some buffalo robe or blanket. Instead of grass, on the ground. So when they arrive there singing, she came up on the porch. And Albert Attocknie put her on his back like a papoose an Indian woman carried. And he carried her from her house to the ceremonial ground. It was a little over a quarter of a mile--on his back. And the party all went over there. They had to go down a little creek and have to go way up to the ceremonial grounds, and there was ceremonial preparations. There was dance grounds and two dancers. Two dancers and singers were already around, and the singing ceremony was going on. And two men were dancing. And these dancers, one of them is dead now. He was a Comanche boy. Wiley Yellowfish was one of the dancers. The other dancer was Apache--Stuart si.kole (Klinkole)--he's still living. They
