

And finally, there was seven of them, went down there, and they knew where they was goin' to be. They'd been over there to breakfast I reckon, either comin' from breakfast or goin' to breakfast, this camp over to Poe's. And they was hid and Chief of Police of Okmulgee, he was standin' behind a tree, he knew where they was comin', and the route they was comin' on. He was standing behind a tree, 'bout 100 yards from where they went by. And when they went by, just on down, just a little ways, there was a little bank about that high, little washout there. And there's four officers, down there, the sheriff of Okmulgee, and three more. They was layin' there too, and these boys was just 70 yards from them, when they started shooting. And when they passed, the chief of police, why, he hollered "Halt," told them to halt. And they didn't think they'd have to kill Harry. They knew they'd have to kill Poe and Bill Hart. But Harry's first man that shot. He shot at the police were over there behind that tree. And he knocked the bark off, or bullet or something, hit the police's hand, and hurt it a little bit, either bullet or the bark off the tree, one. He hit the tree. And then these fellows down here, these four officers, they had automatic Winchesters, and they turned loose on them. And they never did halt or nothin, they just kept a shootin'. I was down there to talk to the police, chief of police, sheriff. And they said this Poe had more blood in him than any fellow they'd ever seen. Said they liked to never killed him. They just shot them all. Harry was just shot once through the head. Chief Riggs shot him. And others shot--one was shot six times. I never, we went and looked at 'em after they was dead--they was covered up. One that had the bullet hole through his head, we could see that. And that was the winding up of the bank robbers.

(They weren't afraid of anything, were they?)

Well, Cherokee Bill, I've got a book here, tells about Cherokee Bill--magazine.
