

tipi, inside, there's a moon. The moon that is made out of dirt. Shaped like a half-moon. And on top of that moon--dirt moon--that's where the peyote, the herb of the plant, you'd call it, sits right on top of that moon. Right below that circle moon, there's where the fire is made. And there's--in that circle where they sit--there's a man that sits on the left-hand side, that keeps up that fire, burning all night. And they have what we call different kind of wood to burn in that tipi, in their worship. And around in that circle there they sit. And this man that sits as a priest take out his smoke and pass it to ever man. Perhaps there might be 40 or 30 inside that tipi. And that smoke must be corn shuck or oak leaf. And it's rolled up like a cigarette, and they all smoke. And each man that smokes, prays for what he wants and why he is in that tipi, and after they get through smoking, and then this man that acting as a priest pass the peyote around. And ever man--if there is 40 or 30 in there--they take out 4 peyote-bunch like that here--four of them, and they eat them. They first take their sage and rub it in their hand. Rub it in their hands and made a motion all over their body. And then they take this four peyotes. Each man takes four. And when they all get through praying--and then the chief begins to sing and passes that drum in a circle to all the 40 men or 30 men that sits in there.

(SIDE B--FIRST FEW MINUTES ARE BLANK)

They take this smoke and the four peyote. Each man eat four when they first pass it around. Then after they all take this peyote, then the chief began to sing four songs. When he gets through singing he passes it down to the next man, and to the next man, and the next, next, till it gets back to the chief. And while they are passing that drum, any man is allowed to eat as much as he wants to. He can eat all he wants. Eat this peyote. And they stay in there, and when midnight come, this priest call for that drum and takes it to back where he's sitting. He sings what they call a Midnight
