

but I just don't remember lot of them, I have forgotten. But that one I had always remembered so vividly because — oh, I guess I must have been nine or ten years old when it was told to me. And they used to tell little night, bedtime stories I guess you'd call them. And they were similar to those that are told by Burroughs and those little animal books. Some of them are very identical. I said you must have been talking to some old Indian.

Katherine: (Could you tell one of them?)

Anna: Well, one funny thing was that the rabbit was always the prankster. And he was always playing tricks on his cousin the bear. And he was always doing things to the bear. One of them was that he told him that he could catch fish if he'd stick his tail, dig a hole in the water and stick it down in there 'cause the bear used to have a long tail. So the bear went out and dug a hole and put his tail down in the water. And that's why the bear has a short tail - his tail froze off. (Laughter) Oh, and just all those little stories. But I have forgotten them:

Katherine: (We have those stories and they're called Hickos (?) What do you call yours?)

Anna: Let me see, at the moment I can't think of those things.

End of Tape