

I say, back Sandra's statement up, because Roxie and myself and Sandra, Earl and Miss Dodie all work--we all work with school children in some way. And this, of course, I think is one of the real important problems that we have among our people, as well as these others. And like Sandra said--I haven't myself realized the need for someone to work in this area also, because I have come into contact with a lot of Indian families-- And I've been to Cache, but I haven't come into contact with students other than Cache and there's a great need like she says. We can work with these Indian students in high schools and colleges, to try to assure them that they can have as much or more than anyone else that's going to school and that they'll have the social--it will be better for them socially as well as it will be educational. Because a lot of them come into the schools deprived of certain things and they have a tendency to withdraw because they feel like they are not up to par with everyone else. And by helping these children reach the same level as everyone else in these areas, then we feel like we can advance'em all the way through. And eventually get them out into some type of field where they can be producing citizens just like we like to think of ourselves as. And like I say, I know there are ways that we can help people in the Bureau and we know that there's people that we can help in Civil Service and this is why we have this type of group involved.

(name not clear): Well, let me first say that I really am grateful for the invitation to come down here and meet with the group. I wasn't expecting to say anything and I don't have much to say, except that certainly a program of this nature, I am all for it. I have sat back for some time and done an awful lot of thinking and no more than thinking, I think perhaps. Perhaps its the same way with you. Certainly you have your minds going and wheels turning and you should see a lot of things that were possible for
