

ill and she moved to Albuquerque. At the time we would go visit her. And I remember we used to go out there and made some friends with some Pueblos out there from the Taos Pueblo. And his name is Mr. Pete Bernall and we were acquainted with his daughter who was a nurse to my sister at the time. And I remember one event that we went up to the Pueblo and this Mr. Bernall took us on a fishing trip. Course it's--he caught all the fish and I didn't catch anything. But seemed like he knew how and I didn't. But I enjoyed the trip anyway, even the scenery up there. And seem like at night time as the sun set, these young Pueblo men would sit around in groups and sing songs. I guess they sing songs to their girl friends. It was very, very beautiful in those days, back in them. And like I said, that was in the thirties and we enjoyed quite a lot there. Course we had made friends of our own out there. I remember that we made friends with Mr. Ernest Echohawk who was living out there at the time and going to school. And his uncle was there, he was staying with his uncle, Mr. George Echohawk. And we had quite a time out there. We would travel out to these other--different reservations such as the Zuni Reservations. All those reservations out there. I was acquainted with a Pawnee, his name was Ray Cummings, who was in the Indian service at the time. And I used to accompany him on these field trips to these different reservations. And learned a little about the western culture, as we might say here. And course in the fall we would go on these hunting trips. I remember on the deer hunting trips we used to go right east of Albuquerque, a range mountains, the Sandia. We used to hunt deer up there. And we used to hunt--go out on the western part of the state. And we used to hunt bear out there. And I remember that I never got a bear, but Mr. Echohawk got one. Shot a bear and brought him back. We had him dressed out and we were invited over to his house for supper which bear was served. Course I just took one taste and that didn't quite appeal to my appetite. Course
