

everyone had a chance to cast the dice. The people like the game so well that they played early in the afternoon until late in the afternoon, when the host usually provided the supper for them. And after they had their supper why they like it so well they'd continue playing after their evening meal. Sometime they played till midnight. And this was how they played this game, they liked it so well that it was really all they did most of the time for their entertainment. The host of these games usually went around when he decide he wanted to have some kind of entertainment. Why he would go and invite all of his relatives and his friends, and they would meet at his home. And they would play this game, this dice game. And the host's wife usually prepared the meal all afternoon and she would play some too, a little. Then she'd go back to tending to her meal, and they had quite a meal at that time. They served very well. And it took all afternoon to prepare a meal. And those were sort of the duties of the host's wife. It took a little time to prepare these dinners. Our people like to eat certain types of food and it always took a long time to prepare them. However, they turned out to be just real--food cooked real well. The host's wife usually visited with the other ladies that would come and they would visit and they would sit down and play awhile. They would get up and help the hostess out. And they just got along real well together. It was just a very fine way of getting together. Most families did that. Not just one or two in particular, all the families liked this game and they--that was how they all got together. Back in those days they didn't have too much other entertainment, this is one in particular that they all enjoyed playing.
