

recall whether they find a dinner or what not. It seems as though they would have the party down at the Indian village and they'd have a huge Christmas tree in the roundhouse and the older persons would get together and they would put their gifts under this Christmas tree. And I remember the Indians, some I remember they would big their children there and I particular called sheepskins and there were several of them tied around the tree and when they had all of the gifts said, I would say they, did I don't recall how many families were there, but it was most all the families of the family of the tribe. And they would go down there and they would hire someone to cut up their skins there. They would oh, make the robes of Candy and they would press the robes out to everyone who were present and anyone who were visiting at the time and I suppose or less an event that would be remembered all the rest of their life. I remember it distinctly the time we were down there. I remember one incident that, I think my brother next to me received a puppy, I am sure it's German puppy. And they had this puppy in what you call a cage with windows with screen in this window. It was a very old cage and one morning little dog was in there barking and barking. And after all the girls run up to see who it was, for it belonged to my brother. I don't remember just what I received at the time, but I can think it probably in the next day or so, one of my gifts found its way between my other packages and I opened everything for the boy. The boy got around his mother, but I am sure we all owned about one time, but I can't remember that we all thought it was very, very ugly or not good. But every one enjoyed themselves, I mean the people. The whole world gathered to the tree in Boston and put the gifts under the tree. And some were here, the people here of the neighborhood groups. And when, the, on the tree, there was, like, a lot of presents and gifts, and then they had a band and the band played and then they sang, they sang together on one of the songs and that's one of the things that I can't remember from the same scene. And I often wondered if it would have been
