

Because they could say, "How does she know?" But I'm old enough to know, nobody will know it though.

(Of course you are.)

I am telling the truth, because I have my right head up.

(Well, I know you are, would you mind telling me again about this where you said you could take that buffalo medicine and you could tell if that person is going to live or die.)

Oh, yes, you could take that in a spoon with a little water. Let's see, and then you take a pinch and put it on--just a pinch--and put it on and if it spreads, it's good luck, but if it sinks, it's bad luck. That's what they claim. And I said, "I believe that." Because I seen it done when this woman was so sick, awful sick. This lady said, "Get me a spoon," so I got her a spoon and gave it to her, and she put water in it and she opened that little buckskin cloth there and she took it and put it in there and I watched her. I sure did watch her because I had my two eyes. I sure did watch her and it just spread over so good. And I said, "Oh good luck. Good." Oh, I just so...in my mind...I didn't say it loud. And I give it to her, so I just gave it to her and she was alright, and she got well. Yeah, it was wonderful, but I don't know how it would be. I never did know if she was going to pass on. I never did see, but they said that's true too.

(Well did everybody have some of this buffalo medicine?)

No, that was hard to get. My uncle, John's uncle, he used to mix it up, but he didn't have all these medicines--most of them were dead. That was the last that that medicine was ever fixed. But he's gone now.

(Now, who is John?)
