Exploring Oklahoma Through Books

ONE HUNDRED and three years ago, Samuel Austin Worcester, a New Englander with the courage and foresight of his race, ascended the Arkansas River to establish at Union Mission, and later at Park Hill, the first publishing house in Oklahoma. From his presses there issued between 1835 and 1859 more than thirteen million printed pages: books, tracts, pamphlets, many of them set in the difficult languages of the Five Civilized Tribes. In this work he identified himself as perhaps the first regional publisher in America, for his publishing interests centered in his region and the people who then inhabited it.

A little less than a hundred years later, in 1928, the University of Oklahoma Press came into being for a similar purpose. Now entering into its tenth year, the Press has from the beginning focussed its attention on the exploration of Oklahoma and the region of which it is a part through the publication of books of lasting value. From the extensive list published in these years has come a new understanding of our past history, the rich heritage of a now mature society; a keener appreciation of our regional resources, both material and cultural; and a more discriminating sense of future values, the potentialities of the region in which we live.

In the Press list will be found interesting books in history, government, economics, petroleum, and science. To each has been given careful attention in design, printing, and binding. Above all, these books represent the best fruits of Oklahoma and Southwestern writing, whether in the fields of general reader interest or in those which are more specialized and technical.
