OHN THOMPSON had always been secretly proud of his friendship with Bill "Turner. Dr. Turner. Judge Turner. Professor Turner. Wherever international law was mentioned, there Bill Turner's name was mentioned, too. And now Bill was coming home from Europe after making a special survey for the government.

John had received a note from Bill, mailed from London, suggesting that he meet the ship in New York. So here John was, boarding the ship to meet Bill Turner.

Naturally, names used in this story are fictitious.

After a long-lost-brother greeting, Bill said, "We'll have to wait a few minutes, John. The press wants to ask a few questions. Then we'll head for the country for the weekend. I have to go to Washington Monday..."

John noticed that the old professorial pace had been stepped up to a man-of-affairs rapidity, but otherwise Bill possessed the same old shaggy friendliness.

At the press conference John stood beside Bill, who parried some questions skilfully and answered others with a crisp directness.

In elaborating on the answer to one question Bill said, "I hadn't thought of this in quite these terms before, but now that I look at John Thompson here beside me and remember his good work, I think I can very easily point out a most important difference between Americans and people in some other parts of the world."

John could feel a redness creeping up his neck as all the reporters looked his way.

"John Thompson," Bill said, "has been working up our way for twenty-five years. He represents an American idea or tradition that's based on two things—freedom and enterprise. John is a New York Life agent. Through the life insurance he sells, men attain security for their families, not by compulsion of the state, but as a matter of choice. They get security without losing their freedom. And that's a mighty important difference."

A couple of bulbs flashed and John blinked.

"Now, if it's all right with you," Bill said to the reporters, "John and I are going off on a little fishing trip—anther good American custom."
