duty as gunnery officer of the destroyer McKean of the Pacific fleet. A native of Norman, he graduated from the University before entering the Naval Academy.

The Congressional Medal of Honor, the nation's highest recognition of valor, was awarded Lieutenants at the time President Truman for his heroic conduct during a Jap kamikaze attack off Okinawa in June, 1945. After evacuating all hands from a sinking destroyer the craft under Lieutenant McCool's command, was attacked simultaneously by two suicide planes. One of the attackers was downed, but the other crashed close to the conning tower. Although badly burned and wounded by shrapnel, Lieutenant McCool rallied his conspicuous courage and saving all aboard from injuries and saved his ship. He was subsequently evacuated on a stretcher and spent many months in Navy hospitals.

Lieutenant McCool, his wife, the former Elaine Laracey, '42ba, (former editor of the Sooner Magazine), Norman, and daughter, Carolyn, will reside in quarters at the Naval Station in New Orleans.

Youth's face and read the future. Neither does the aptitude test discover the latent spark in the timid soul. Often dreams of accomplishment are carefully concealed and talents remain undiscovered.

"The medical students' teachers with four years of intimate contact find appraisal difficult. Even though they make discoveries which seem to warrant prophesies, often their judgment is in error. Two hundred years ago Oliver Goldsmith and Edmund Burke were fellow students at Trinity College. Goldsmith was a 'fizar,' performing mental tasks in return for board and instruction. Even from the wisest of his teachers there was no echo of his real merit. At Elphinstone, Athlone and Edgeworthstone he had been considered 'heavy, dull, and obtuse.' But in spite of this scholastic record he was destined to sit with Burke at club tables in London and to attract to his own table the great Dr. Samuel Johnson."

"While he worked his way through school without distinction, some undiscovered force concealed by his obtuse personality was working toward his immortal achievements. When he died Burke 'burst into tears.' Johnson wrote 'he was a very great man,' and Reynolds 'put aside painting for the day.'

"Oklahoma's present needs in the field of medicine including research offer unusual opportunities for the young medical graduate. Patiently teachers and friends shall await the verdict. Only time can tell Who's Who. Oklahomans expect the members of the medical class of 1947 to glorify their Alma Mater and bring a mellow light over Oklahoma medics. William Osler has said, 'Life is a straight, plain business, and the way is clear; blurred for you by generations of strong men, into whose hands you enter and whose ideals must be your inspiration. In my mind's eye I can see you twenty years hence—resolute-eyed, broad-headed, smooth-faced men who are in the world to make a success of life.' This is what your young university and your relatively new state needs.

It's to be hoped that the twenty-year record will bring a high average and that each member of the class will win a high place in his profession, thus making it difficult to determine Who's Who."
