Sooners Abroad

Every month Sooners write home from addresses that encircle the globe. Two recent graduates have been seeing Europe from the vantage point of the Fulbright scholar, while a third alumnus is one of the U.S. technicians living in Asia. All three have some definite views on Americans abroad—views which can be found on the following pages.

Bill Tiffany
Fulbrighter in Germany

GERMANY—a country draped on one side by the Iron Curtain and on the other side by the Free World. In this setting Fulbright scholar Bill Tiffany, '59bs, and his wife (the former Bunny Morrison) spent a year at the University of Heidelberg.

In his study of physics at Heidelberg, Tiffany worked in an atmosphere very different from that of American universities. "The university is more loosely organized," he says. "Each department has more autonomy. Full professors carry a great deal more prestige in their community than those in America. The university president, on the other hand, is held in no greater esteem than the professors."

In Germany students are expected to govern their own personal affairs without guidance from the university. No one forces them to attend class or to pass their final exam before graduation.

While in Europe Tiffany and his wife toured 16 countries. Only in the Sicilian, Spanish and Portuguese villages and the Norwegian backwoods did they have any trouble communicating.

"In the cities," Tiffany says, "it is pretty easy to find English-speaking natives. We were almost always able to communicate eventually, and with some experience we could read the street signs and other notices in almost every language."

"The American tourist has done much to damage the prestige of the West in Europe," Tiffany reports. Many Germans as well as other Europeans consider America intellectually and culturally inferior to themselves, although ahead of Russia.

Tiffany noted very little bitterness toward Americans, and found Germany basically an enlightened and freedom-loving country, which has developed the strongest economy in Europe.

Europeans in general want to learn more about America, but their contact with the American way of life has led to a distorted outlook. The average German, Tiffany says, thinks that all Americans live in Fifth Avenue type apartments, and they are astounded when they learn of the individual small homes in the United States.

Among the Germans, desire for reunion with families and friends in the eastern sector is very great. But Tiffany believes that they will not sacrifice their freedom in exchange for Communism. Therefore, they realize that possible reunion has no immediate chance. Most Germans feel that Berlin must be held as a last foothold and a door to the East.

"The value of Berlin was demonstrated," Tiffany says, "by the fact that 6,000 refugees were using it each week as a means to freedom."

Communism is a very real threat to the German people. Many of them have escaped from Communist domination, leaving behind their family, friends and possessions. Such was the case with Tiffany's German family. This family had never had any contact with Americans. Only their 19-year-old daughter spoke English.

"Our landlord and his family had undergone much privation in the Russian zone," Tiffany says. "By hard work and shrewdness the father had made his way back to prosperity (in West Germany) after enduring two years in the Russian concentration camps. He impressed us as a very hardened individual."

"But much to our surprise, when we said our good-byes, it was the father who broke down and cried. This made us feel that the year of contact with this one family had been worthwhile."

Marilyn Richardson

Fulbrighter in France

Great bowls of Turkish coffee, Picasso in the kitchen, hitchhikes to Paris—these were all part of Marilyn Richardson's year in France with the Fulbright program.

Armed with a triple major from O.U. in French, history and government, Miss Richardson, '59ba, began her work as a Fulbright scholar in September, 1959, at the University of Lyon, France.

In Lyon she lived with a young French couple and their nine-year-old son in one of France's ancient but comfortable apartment buildings. Miss Richardson's family was an array blend of French, Turkish and Armenian.

"Because of their mixed ancestry," Marilyn says, "our food was a curious combination of Asian and European recipes. They loved antiqued and modern art, and they decorated the kitchen and w.c. (water closet) with their own Picasso-like artwork. Nearly every morning we sat in that wild kitchen and drank huge bowls of thick black Turkish coffee."

"Transforming classroom French into native conversational French is tricky business. To cope with this problem the Fulbrighters in France spent a month in Paris at an orientation session, before being sent to their various provincial universities.

"I felt adequately prepared for the classes," Miss Richardson says. "At first I enrolled in some classes for foreign students, but I dropped out because they were too elementary."

The French university system is very different from anything in the United States. The classes are very large—300 to 400 students in a lecture class—with little class participation.

"Although they are excitable," she explains, "the French people are rather cold at first. But they are exceptionally warm once you become friends with them. We were encouraged to talk freely with our French friends and were asked to give our own views and the views of our government on any controversial issues. There is a lot of bitterness in France about the war, but it is not so open now. The people are friendly and courteous, but not gushing. The greatest honor a French family can give you is inviting you in to the home."

While headquarters in Lyon, Miss Richardson and her friends spent their free time touring Europe. She spent Christmas in Rome; at Easter she stayed with her adopted family at Cannes on the Riviera, and at the end of the school year she took a 1,200 mile tour of France, Germany, Austria, and Switzerland.

Hitchhiking is a common mode of travel in France. On one trip to Paris she hitchhiked the 300 miles from Lyon, riding the entire distance with a Baptist missionary from Alabama who was working in southern France.

"Although the French like the Fulbrighters," Marilyn says, "they don't like tourists. They remember only the obnoxious ones which makes it difficult for the really serious ones who want to learn."

The Fulbright program is financed by the French government and administered by a board made up of American and French representatives. A Fulbright scholar must be relatively unfamiliar with the country in which he is studying and he is chosen with an eye toward open mindedness and willingness to learn and to teach.

Although Miss Richardson's year as a Fulbright scholar is over, her return to the States September 14, was a brief one. On October 14 she again set a course for Paris where she will work with the Fulbright commission as an administrative assistant and as O.U.'s American in Paris.
