Portrait of an Engineer

Cultivating this crop that James made his best money as a boy: $1 a day for twelve or fourteen hours work. Good for a youngster.

James continued in this life until after his junior year in high school, when his father eyed the southwest, heard prosperity's call and gathered the family together for a conference. It was agreed they would sell the farm, pack stock and belongings together and hit the rails for Oklahoma.

And come to Oklahoma they did—cows, equipment, household goods and all—aboard the train. The elder James located a half-section about 10 miles east of Oklahoma City, and there they settled.

To the 17-year-old James, this new country appeared much different from the fertile farmland of central Illinois, where you could push a dry stick into the ground and come back the next day to count leaves. Oklahoma looked dry and red and dusty. But as the dust here gets into everything, it made its way into the Illini's heart, and he stayed.

Immediately upon settling the family was hit by two drought years, so that when James graduated from high school, there were few prospects for college. But the boy wanted to be an engineer, and there was no way to enter the field without more education. His father was a natural as a tinkerer and builder and could handle the complicated problems of high arithmetic.

The father regretted that he could not have been an engineer, and the son was not going to hold the same regrets. So, taking determination as about his only possession, the young James got a job with the railway mail service. After four years he felt he had enough of a stake to see him through college and he entered O.U.

During his student years—since money for him was not in the Stutz Bearcat class—he did drafting for counties and private engineering organizations, producing city...
