The Assets of the Graduating Senior . . .

problems which the individual must surmount in order to graduate from college.

The student's success in completing high school displays the presence of a latent ability in the individual to think. His thinking ability is limited by his immature age, experience, and background. While working toward a degree, he is able to overcome these deficiencies to a large extent. He is required to reason for himself, and must adhere reasonably close to the narrow path which leads to the first major goal in his career, the attainment of a college education. This attainment is evidence of applied self discipline.

The student enters college with the ability to analyze and cope with only those problems with which he has come in direct contact. While attending college, he is subjected to a great variety of problems unrelated to his background, problems similar to those he will encounter in business.

He is taught to approach these problems cautiously, analytically, and with a knowledge of the seriousness of errors in business. His approach to a problem today is entirely foreign to what it was four years ago. The graduate's thinking ability has matured into a valuable asset to himself and to his employer, and results in his being considered a potential executive.

The success of an individual depends to a large extent on his ability to express himself. This is one skill in particular that he has an opportunity to learn in college. He is constantly pressed to communicate his ideas through reports, speeches, and informal discussions. This is not to say that the graduate is an expert in expressing himself, but he does know the basic principles of writing and speaking, and he has had considerable experience in this area.

In conclusion, the business graduate's assets display his potential. His mature and objective reasoning, his ability to express himself, and the determination he has shown are his chief assets. With proper training and years of experience added to this background, there is a good possibility that he may become a leader in his field.
