The present First National Bank and Trust Company was born of a need for national bank services when Oklahoma City was a town of tents and one-story wooden shacks. Its customers were men who controlled the destiny of Oklahoma City in 1889. Its founders were men of public spirit and fine character.

Recognizing the mutual dependence of BANK and CUSTOMERS, the founders dedicated themselves to policies of service to this community when the Oklahoma City of today was only a vision in their hearts.

How well they built is shown by The First National of today, a fifty million dollar institution with more than 40,000 customers... but adhering to the principles of public service laid down nearly half a century ago.

We of the present First National salute those leaders of the past whose efforts made our position possible. We are proud of the fact that sons and grandsons of the alliance begun more than four and a half decades ago continue...
