Sixty-four students have been accepted as the freshman class at the University of Oklahoma School of Medicine. The fall term began September 20.

Selections were made on a competitive basis from 265 Oklahoma applicants. No out-of-state students were considered, although there were some students going on through higher grades. There are two secondary schools.

If attendance were restricted to children within the city limits of the capital, Carmichael said, the schools would be able to accommodate most of the children, but unfortunately that is not possible. Ethiopia has no census and any child who applies for enrollment can claim he is a resident of the city. The youth of the country is eager for education and the demand for seats in the classrooms is much greater than their capacities. When a school is filled, the enrollment is closed.

"This works to one advantage, so far as the teacher is concerned," said Carmichael. "We have no disciplinary problems in Ethiopia. With every child pleading to attend classes, if one of the enrolled students doesn't profit from his studies, or if he doesn't have and follow instructions, he is immediately dismissed and another allowed to take his place."

There are 16 schools in Addis Ababa, a city of approximately 150,000. Ten of the schools take the student through the lower grades, varying from the third to the sixth grade. Four are elementary schools, with grades varying from the third to the sixth.
