"The weight-throwing form that John Jacobs, Oklahoma track coach, teaches to his track team boomeranged on the Sooner coach in a novel way recently.

"Jacobs was awakened in the middle of the night by neighbors.

"Something's in the hen house killing the chickens,' they wailed. 'Come quick.'

"The Sooner coach draped a robe over his pajamas, slipped on his shoes and went over to see what about it. Dewey 'Sooner' Luster, former Oklahoma football coach who lives in the same neighborhood of what Jacobs proudly calls 'The Residential District,' heard the commotion and joined them. Jacobs' flashlight disclosed a big possum in the hen house. With the women warning him he might be bitten, Jacobs picked up the possum by the tail.

"He carried the animal outside. It was muddy from a rain. The Sooner coach aimed to bash the varmit's head against a nearby fireplug, thus terminating its chinless existence. But recalling his 1911 hammer throw, Jacobs wound up. But he forgot that his shoes were unlaced. As he started to swing that big possum around him, his feet went out from under him and he sat down in the mud puddle. The possum sailed 30 feet in the air.

"Everybody knows a possum won't bite anyone but a persimmon,' Jacobs growled later as he de-muddled himself.

Drama School

For years the drama students have been learning to write their own plays. Arthur Wilmurt, a new University drama instructor and a playwright for ten years, is teaching his craft to eight students. Playwrighting was formerly taught at the University by Robert Whitehand, '33ba, and by Rupel Jones. Whitehand, hailed by critics as a promising young writer, was killed in Army action in 1945.

Four of the student-written one-acts were produced April 12-13 for the high school students participating in the dramatic festival. Plays given were: The Lion Tamer, a circus story by William M. Morgan, Oklahoma City sophomore; That's the Spirit, a farce on spiritualism by Laurence Swanison, senior from Roosevelt; Backfire, a hobo-jumbo melodrama by Larry Suffall, senior from Leewood, West Virginia; Pavane, a phantasy by Phelps Manning, sophomore from Mt. Vernon, Iowa.

The young playwrights will now point their products toward producers and sales.

Tall Wilmurt has a mustache. He taught scene design and technical production at Yale University for five years. He came to the University last Fall.

At Yale he was a student of the late George Pierce Baker, teacher of literary giants Eugene O'Neill, Thomas Wolfe and others. Wilmurt describes his student days under Baker in this way: "You were afraid of him. He was very strict. He taught and you learned by trial and error. He made you want to do your best."

Wilmurt's play The Guest Room, was produced in 1931 in New York. Noah, his adaptation from the French play, was produced by Sam French in 1937.

Wilmurt has just completed working on plays under a Guggenheim fellowship, and is dividing his time between writing and teaching.

He starts his students out rewriting and studying situations. They learn how to develop characters and adapt them to situations. Finally the students write their own plays. Wilmurt counsels them. They progress from one-acts eventually to three-acts.
