Off in High Gear

Rush, orientation and the opening of school brought a swarm of students to the campus and headaches for some ... Reported by the editor of the Oklahoma Daily.

By BILL CRAWFORD, '54

The 1953-54 school year jumped off into a quick high gear during the first week of September, when more than 900 freshmen landed on campus for one of the biggest fraternity and sorority rushes in the school's history.

After a tiring week of smiles, handshakes, cokes, cigarettes and windy conversations, 420 women and 511 men donned ribbons and officially began their college social careers as pledges of O.U.'s 13 sororities and 25 fraternities.

The remainder of the class of '57 arrived September 7, and were greeted with a comparatively new—and this year intensified—program, Freshman Orientation Week.

Under the sponsorship of the Student Senate and with guidance from administrative officials, the schedule provided for lectures on O.U.'s history, information concerning the locations of various buildings on campus and variety shows and open houses. A panel, under the direction of the Association of Women Students, advised women on dating, clothes, study and other activities.

Ginger Hoffman Lowry, Woodward, was chairman of Orientation week. She was assisted by Betsy Blatt, Oklahoma City, Student Senate president, Don Morse, Henrietta, vice chairman, and a crew of other student senators and committee workers.

With Orientation Week came registration for everyone except those freshmen and transfer students who were permitted to pre-enrol during the summer. Registration was handled through an alphabetical system that eliminated the customary strain on students and enrolment workers.

Returning students noticed a number of changes on campus. They found new sidewalks in front of the Union building, rustic benches set up on the grounds—the results of work by some 45 students and landscape employees, who during the summer sodded nearly half of the campus.

The new grass is part of a long range program of the University landscape division to have the campus completely sodded by September of next year.

Block sodding has been accomplished on the grounds of Cross Center, the Women's Quadrangle, Home Economics Building.

South Oval, and parkways north of Brooks St. Work around the Union was to have been completed by Notre Dame game time.

With the prospect of the Notre Dame clash and Oklahoma's general football fever, students as well as state citizens were going to all means to secure tickets.

More than 100 students falsified marital status to obtain two season athletic ducats during enrollment. Ken Farris, business manager of the department of athletics, and the administration checked the status of all students who bought tickets for wives in order to weed the honestly married from the frauds.

As the news was released, President Cross gave the illegal married couples a week to clear themselves. Students who did not confess had both tickets jerked and their money refunded.
