The Fourth Infantry Division, commanded by Maj. Gen. Raymond O. Barton, '07, Ada, was reported among American units closing in last month on the German homeland.

This division was one of three units which led the Allied breakthrough west of St. Lo and fought its way into Paris with the Second French Armored Division. General Barton directed the St. Lo fighting from a farmhouse on a French widow's farm.

After entering Paris, the Fourth then pushed on to the east and participated in the attack on the Siegfried line. General Barton's men landed in Normandy on D-Day and took part in the capture of Cherbourg.

Col. E. H. (Bud) Larecy, '26, C-4 officer who was recently promoted to his present rank, was with the Seventh Army in the Southern France invasion and in the advance last month north of Belfort.

In a letter to his family in Norman he wrote, "It is really a sight to see the Americans go in the towns. The people just go mad. Old men and women, kids of all ages line the roads and streets, yelling and clapping their hands, passing out wine, and the soldiers throwing cigarettes and C rations out of the trucks."

He describes France as "really a beautiful country." The Riviera where they landed reminded him of Southern California, with resorts and mountains running down to the sea. He compared the rolling, velvety-green farm land to a very well kept golf course, with fat cattle, great Percheron horses, sheep and chickens.

"The farmers grow food," Colonel Larecy wrote. "It's only in the towns that the people are hungry."
