history books are so filled with allusions to the theatre, and the Japanese are so fond of all sorts of amusements, one can not avoid acquiring considerable information concerning them. During the centuries of Japan’s development, several types of drama have emerged, the distinct forms of which are retained intact, even after scores of years. The No and Kabuki are two of the most commonly known forms. When the lighter musical shows and the cinema of the west were introduced, along with many of the other venuers of civilization, they were simply adapted to the traditions and customs already existing. For instance, the family has always made a day of an entertainment. Just as a caller would regard himself as impolite if he failed to remain with you less than several hours, just so a family would not think of staying less than half a day at an entertainment. Restaurants are built in connection so that between acts and during the long intermissions, the patrons may eat their meals or drink tea.

The older forms of the theatre usually start during the afternoon, continuing until late in the evening. The final show at the movie houses usually begins about six o’clock. Only an Oriental’s patience would stand for such a long performance, or the unusually long intervals between numbers. Unfortunately for any Westerner who may be present in the audience, the “talkies” are usually distorted (save for a few of the larger Tokyo theatres) by the voice of an announcer who makes running explanations of what the characters are saying …

"THE RELATIONS OF LEARNING"
"Teaching is the method of disseminating knowledge already acquired. Research is the 'systematic investigation of phenomena by experimental methods to discover facts or co-ordinate them into laws.' . . . "Scientific synthesis and the prevention of waste are the objectives of research." "There is a widespread opinion throughout the country that there has been a decline in the standards of integrity and efficiency of public officials. Office holding must ever be regarded as a public trust. It is not sufficient that our officials be honest; they must be intelligent and well qualified for the services they are called upon to render." "It is equally necessary to train our people to follow wise leadership. Society has not done enough for any man if it has not taught him how to discriminate between the demagogue and the honest political leader. The common task of all of our schools is to supply the kind of education that will improve the quality of citizenship."
"Our institutions must see to it that religious faith is not undermined by the content of courses that we offer or the attitude of those who impart knowledge to the student."
"Education is under fire from many angles today. The charges include overemphasis of athletics; waste of time, money, and effort on boys and girls not interested in acquiring a college education; profitless courses of instruction; misplaced emphasis in the curriculums; and numerous other indictments of more or less validity or justification. Honesty compels us to admit that some of the criticisms are supported by undeniable facts."

The content of "The Relations of Learning" includes interesting and important comment on scores of current topics related to college, such as adjustments necessary for the student, his hazards, distractions, tragedies, valuable experiences and tests of character; evaluation of content of courses, reasons for attending, measurement of accomplishments, use of leisure time and study preparation for classroom work; obligations to society, predictions for the future of learning, duties of instructors and moral, social and economic obligations. These topics and dozens of others impel the intelligent reader to follow through to the last page.

Every Oklahoman can point with pride to this product of the University of Oklahoma Press.
