It is probable that a conflict of authority between the tribal authorities and the government at the Emahaka academy, in the Seminole nation, will be settled October 1 by the removal of the superintendent, Mrs. Davis, who was appointed by the tribal government. It is understood that the superintendent of the Indian schools here has received instructions to that effect, although the supervisor of the schools will not commit himself as to the contents of the order.

The original treaty with the government provided that the schools be turned over to the secretary of the interior by the tribal government on March 4, 1906. On March 2, of that year, however, a resolution was adopted by congress extending the tribal governments in the five nations until some necessary work could be completed, such as the signing of deeds, etc. The Seminole author-
