

You say that Four Horns was left for dead on the battle-field. Did his comrades he was dead? Or were they chased away by the enemy? How was Four Horns hurt? How did it happen that the enemy did not find him and scalp him? I would like to know all about this fight.

Yes Four Horns was left for dead in the battle field near the Misselshell. The Sioux or Tetons then were on Grass Creek (Now Crow Reservation). It was late in the day when the battle ended the crows were driven away. Some one made the report that Four Horns died early in the battle. The Sioux had taken the Crow's horses and were in haste to drive them

You say that Sitting Bull was in this fight. What did he do? Who else was there? Are any of these men alive now?

.....away before the Crows brought reinforcements. Four Horns was wounded three places. He was just stunned when he was seen. Thru the night he crawled to a Buffalo wallow, he pulled out the arrows out of his wounds, he treated his wounds, he was near a spring of water. Swelling took place. He got a long willow to shoo away the wolves when they came too near. It was two months before he was able to travel on foot at that. In the mean time the Tetons had moved to Yongue River. In his weakened condition he took a long time to travel being alone he traveled nights. He shot antelopes, dried the meat, parched it made it into punican, as a little of that goes a long ways. It is said his relations went to look for him but he had left they could not find him. He was afraid to stay near the battle grounds as he expected both sides would be coming looking for their dead. His relations had been mourning for him. You know mourning is something dreadful one must cut off the hair (the ornament of the body) cut the arms and legs in gashes, put on sack cloth and sometimes ashes are put on the head, wailing and singing for three or four days without eating to show the grief. One must be heard in wailing and
