

the two reputations lies the truth, and I agree with you that it is probably nearer Sitting Bull's door.

I hope we may keep in touch with each other, because I believe we share alike an admiration for the Sioux people. My interest, of course, is in their life at the present time from the anthropological viewpoint, although I spent three years on the historical sources as well, for a background.

If you happen to know my friend Forrest Clements, at the University, will you please give him my regards?

Sincerely yours,

P.S. There is a fairly interesting and rather long account of Sitting Bull written by a very intelligent Indian, the Wood Mountain quest which appeared recently in an Ontario newspaper. It was copied verbatim from the quaint written English of the Indian. Although it contains nothing that you do not already know, I thought you might be interested:
