Innediately after the surrender, the Indians were placed between the Post and the stearboat landing and there remained secure in Major Brotherton's charge until a fev months after, when they were transferred to standing fock Agency.

On the evening of my arrival at Ft. Yates I made the acquaintance of several officers at the club room, among whom was Capt. HoDougal of the 7th Cavalry, who was with Hajor Benteen at the time of the Custer massacre, and who, with his commandie officer, attacted the Indians so savasely that Sitting Bull was compelled to retreat. I also met Lieutenant Brennen, of the Seventeanth Infantry, aleo Captain Greene, Gaptain Howes, Colonel Stewsrt and others. Anouncing to then the object of ry visit they olunteered their services to make my trip a successful one.

On the following momine I was introduced to Mre. Mcloughlin, wife of Major MeLoughlin the Indian agent. This excellent lady is official interpreter for the government, and her influence witi the Indians at the post is almost equal to that of Sitting Mull himself. Her sergices to me were invaluable, of which $I$ shall speak hereafter.

Shortly before noon a goverment team was placed at my disposal, with a driver, and accompanied by Captain McDougal and Lieut. Brennen, I drove down to sitting Bull's camp, one mile south of the Fort. Upon reaching the teepees we learmed of a funeral which was then taking place, the body being $578 / 579$ that of Sitting Bull's nephew, sixteen years old, ho had died the day previous of lung trouble contracted while he was attending school in the southern part of the territory. This opportunity I conld not forego, so at ay solicitation we drove over the hills two miles or more, and came apon the funeral procession, if such it can be called, just as the body was being deposited. It is the custom of the sioux to hang their dead up on the branches of trees, when in a wooded country, but when their camp is on the prairie they erect scaffolds sbout ten feet in height, upon the top
