ole that the Sioux losses were somewhat greater than the number/these es indicates. The Sioux and Cheyennes went back to camp to dance in triumph when the four days of mourning for their losses should elapse. They were pleased with their victory and encouraged by the way they had got into the troops. But they were all anxiously awaiting the fulfillment of the vision Sitting Bull had had at the Sun Dance not long before — a vision of soldiers upside down falling into the Sioux camp — a vision that meant victory among the tipis. The big day was yet to come.
