

When old timers get together if they are not talking about buffalo hunts they will talk about war stories.

When a man is going off instead of saying good-bye and shaking hands they cry - lament. That is, when he went any place where there was danger. Even when the young men and women are going off east to school, or when they come back after being a long time absent. This is a sort of wail.

Did SB make any move before he was shot? No, he was killed right there. Bull Head shot just about as soon as Shavehead. Red Tomahawk was behind him so he fired another shot.

On the north side the valley extended about one mile, on the south side a little bit less than a half mile. The timber and houses were right near the stream.

Bull Head was the first one who shot and then Red Tomahawk. Then there was a third one. There may have been others. In a joking way they called the third a <sup>touch of fiction</sup> coup.

The relatives of the policemen killed came: Armstrong, Little Eagle.

Middle was the one who was wounded. He waited over 20 years to get a pension and just about the time he got it he died. Lone Man said the police were promised pensions in case they were killed down there. That is why it makes the Indians so sore to think about it. Francis Bull Head's father was killed there and for over thirty years his mother had to go without a pension with no one to look after her. They had some congressmen who didn't care about such things. Now since they are voters they have some good congressmen.

SB did not have on a ghost shirt when he was arrested. It was a sacred garment and he didn't sleep in it.

The Indians were very much under the control of their chiefs. They
