

It would be a literary undertaking of great originality & charm to describe the life of our big wild animals, the buffalo, elk, antelope, deer, moose, bear, goat, sheep, eagle etc. etc. from the point of view of the Indian Hunter, together with the magnificent setting of the prairie, mountain, forest, & river landscape.

Perhaps some time spent in a large zoological garden (Chicago, New York or Denver) with a season spent in ^{for you} Yellowstone Park would be a sufficient preparation for this undertaking.

The only logical title for such a book would, of course, be:

"Happy Hunting Ground": ~~Appropriate~~ in that case, as it would not refer to the future life of pseudo-Indian belief.

Such a book, of course, must be illustrated. It might thus become an ideal work to acquaint the coming generation (boy scouts, school children etc. etc.) with our truly magnificent wild animals in their equally magnificent landscape home.

There are, to my knowledge, only about three or four men in this country who could illustrate such a book adequately.
