

It was very amusing the way we would break horses. We would take a year-old colt and drive him to where there was a sandbar. The horse couldn't kick much in the loose sand. We would catch a colt and not put any bridle on him. When someone would volunteer we would take the blanket off the horse and let him go. We used to have a lot of fun breaking the colts this way. Sometimes they would give us a pretty tough time, plunge us in the water or run away with us. We generally broke the colts in this way and later on would take them out and break them bareback. We wouldn't use any spurs. The dangerous part of breaking a pony is when they rear back.

No. 1 - The feathers on the shield were chosen by SB's father signifying that he had been successful four times on the warpath. The eagle on the shield was also selected by SB's father for him. The figure standing represents a Crow Indian. The stick is a coup stick. There is only one feather in the coup stick.

No. 2 - The feathers on the tail of the war bonnet mean the same thing as feathers worn on a coup stick. The figures are a Crow man and three women.

SB must have had a dream of the thunderbird because he painted his face with lightening. Only those who dreamed of the thunder birds or the clowns (called the foolish ones <sup>if</sup> "contrary" to the heyoka) painted their faces with lightening. The dream of a thunder bird requires humility on the part of a dreamer. In order to save himself from lightening he must humiliate himself before the whole tribe every time he has the dream. SB must have performed the ceremony of the thunder bird one time. Generally the dream just comes once in a lifetime. Old timers believed that the thunder was caused by a big bird much larger than the eagle. They either imagined it or had dreamed about it.
