

Little Big Man - This man's name was mentioned at the time when there were negotiations between the commissioners and the Indians about the Black Hills. He was one of those very daring men who say anything though he was not authorized to do it. If he was one of the soldiers or scouts he would have been right to say things but he made a threat at those conferences that any Indian who signs that agreement he would shoot and they became afraid of him. He was riding a horse, pretty nearly stripped naked and carrying a gun. Everybody thought he might do it and nobody signed the treaty. That was in '75. That was one of the reasons they did not sign because Little Big Man threatened to shoot them. At that time the head men were all opposing this treaty. To this day whenever a young man or anybody does anything like this Little Big Man . . . He was a rash man. Some say it was just a bluff but it worked.

Scouts
SB's Scouts - Under SB they had these regular scouts, or soldiers. These scouts were something like the knights in olden times. They were a body of young men of good character and good families and the object of their being members of the scouting party was to keep order and to help people and in case someone does harm to the tribe they are allowed to punish that party. They are mostly young men, 16 to 18 years up.

One Bull married several times. At most four though I know of only two of his wives.

Big Foot - Some men, some mischief makers, became famous by some mischief they started. This man was an insignificant individual among the tribe until he got messed up with the Ghost Dance.

Red Tomahawk never made any reputation that is worth mentioning until he became a policeman. Especially when all the oldtime chiefs are dead and all the Indian police who served with him are dead they
