VOL. LXXXVII No. 4

EDITOR

The Parachute Courier	ARED WHITE	2
To match wits with the aces of the German Secret Service was one thing. To track down the monster who plotted the wholesale slaughter of Allied horses was quite another.
The Everlasting Hunger (A Poem)	BERT COOKSLEY	15
Eyes Of The Night	J. ALLAN DUNN	16
The bank robbery was beautifully planned, even to the plane that was to lose the two crooks in the South Carolina swamps. In fact, it might have been the perfect crime, if . . .
War For Fire.	J. H. ROSNY	27
Stalwart enough to conquer the mighty tiger, shrewd enough to master the thundering mammoth, were our shaggy ancestors of the Stone Age. But without fire they were children indeed.
The Rifle	PERRY ADAMS	57
The rich caravans that wended their way through Khyber Pass were tempting prizes even to honorable Pathan warriors. The dacoit chief knew young Abdur did not join his band for loot.
For Observation	ANDREW A. CAFFREY	68
All his mates called Flying Cadet Booth Delano a madcap. His superior officers considered him merely mad. And Delano was the sort who could capitalize a bad reputation.
The Yukon Kid (Part II)	JAMES B. HENDRYX	79
Continuing a story of the Klondike Gold Rush: ". . . They'll drown an' they'll freeze, they'll starve an' steal an' murder. An' the devil will git his share!"
A Man Of Eloquence	JAMES MITCHELL CLARKE	98
That Western mob was going to hang the tenderfoot, in any case. So they'd give him a trial, and even go so far as to listen to his pretty speech.
First Cousins To Noah's Ark	GENERAL RAFAEL DE NOGALES	106
(An Article)
Sea Pay	ROBERT CARSE	107
A twist of Fate had lost Captain Fleming his ship and his good name. Now a derelict fleeing the French police, was Fate relenting?
The Water Sign (An Article)	A. L. SPELLMEYER	120

The Camp-Fire	121	Ask Adventure	124	Trail Ahead	128
