was a museum in Galena Illinois which we visited, that had a lock of hair in its collections. It was said to be Sitting Bull's. I wonder if it could be the same one?

The Museum of the University of Pennsylvania has in its collections a shield said to have belonged to Sitting Bull. It has painted on its surface a design consisting of a quartered moon and stars on a yellow background. There is a hole in it - whether from a bullet or not, I don't know. They also have in their collections a war bonnet taken from a Sioux shot by troops on his way to Canada.

I happened to take "Sitting Bull" to my grandmother's a few days ago. When she saw it she told me of the story the newspapers ran when he was shot in the back. Among other things it was mentioned he was hiding under the bed. It makes me hoil to think of how poor old "Bull" suffered in his later days.

There was a question I wanted to ask you. Was the dog society found among the Teton? I know it was at Cheyenne society and recently heard it mentioned by Paul Radin as one of the Ogallala societies.

Thanking you a million times for what you've done for me.

Sincerely yours,
M. Alfred Powell
