

For stealing a nap during spare moments nothing could be better. The robes will protect one from the cold and chill which all experience when snoozing, if uncovered. With one of these beautiful robes thrown over the couch it is always in a handy place for just such needs.

A Luxury for Travelers

While traveling, it is almost impossible to get along without one of these robes. One continually hears: "I fell asleep on the train and when I awoke, discovered that I had caught cold." A Pendleton Indian Robe will prove just the article desired on occasions of this kind. Rolled up and secured with a common shawl strap, it makes a very small bundle, and for a nap on the train, is just the thing.

For steamer rugs Pendletons "can't be beat," as they are light and very warm and take up scarcely any room in the steamer trunk, where room is the first consideration. Folded up they can be laid on top, in a well-filled trunk, and the lid closed down with perfect ease.

For Driving

For driving, they are a novelty and at the same time make an excellent lap robe. It is the custom now, in localities where sleighing can be indulged in, to trim a cutter with
