

powerful effect for good. The work that Governor Brown does, at the present time, is one of love. The religion he preaches he practices in his every day life. His people know his life and his deeds and the influence he exerts will be felt many, many years after he has been laid to rest among the people he loves so well.

For many miles around the Seminoles gather at this church for service. The membership of the church is large and includes many of the prominent men of the tribe. Eighty percent of the membership are full bloods for the blood of the Seminoles has been kept purer than that of any other of the Five Civilized tribes.

Modesty is one of the chief characteristics of Governor Brown. While he succeeded John Jumper as the governor of his people, he frankly gives him credit as being the greatest man of his people -- greater than Osceola.

"John Jumper," said Governor Brown, "was the greatest man we ever produced. He did not possess the strategy of Osceola, for he was not a warrior. He led his people to Oklahoma, saw that all were comfortably settled in this their new home, counseled them to be self-supporting and just men, combatted
