

taining a church near his home at Sasakwa, where he preached to his people each Sunday. He was often called to represent his people in inter-tribal council and occasionally to visit Washington, for the purpose of attending to their interests. He was regarded as a conservative man and was much trusted by all of the Seminole people. He died at his home October 21, 1919.