

Back of it--back here, and it just popped out. So, that's the way the Comanches seen it, whenever a child gets choked, they always said, Pah kia ha, they call his name and hit it on the back and it comes out. And today, it's still that way. Even his name, got that medicine. Even a big man was choking and they hit him on the back with that name and it came out. So there is something that a lot of people have seen and don't never tell. But I have seen it myself and I know he'd got the medicine--a real old man when I was a girl. So today, I don't think anybody has unless they are magicians. This old medicine man's name was Pah kia ha, which means "Old dried blanket made out of hide." And his other names was Wa se yah, which means, "Holding Eagle Tail." And that was his medicine name they tell me. And later, afterwards, his son had that name, known to all Comanches as Qua she ya, but he doesn't have any medicine. And he told the Indians that he's got a medicine that bullets will go flat on you when you get there, when they shoot at you. Well, when they went over there, there was a bluff right through kinda northeast of the place where the Adobe Walls was. That's where the Indians gathered to get ready to attack. So while they were there, the sun was comin' up and they all said, "Ready, let's go." And when they went, I guess people--a lot of people were there and they all have what they saw when it was going on. The people were in the stockade, and of course they couldn't very well shoot anybody. All I know stayed behind the stockade. And they all went around them--going around, and he had a lot of people killed there. And somebody says Quanah Parker was over there. But I didn't think so. I read about it where he was went over there and was coming back for what, I don't know, and he wasn't there. But, there was a lot of people killed over
