

the person that that dinner is for. Just a remembrance to them, you know.
(are - is. . . .)

Can't think of what that is. Why it is. Bob's mother used to tell me, you know, things, about I have just forgotten, you know, quite a few, now like that, you know.

Third voice: Now you told me one time.

Uh-huh. Now I can't think what that is. But. . . .

THE PERSON WHO IS ASSIGNED TO HANDLE ALL DETAILS

Third voice: What about the stick in the grave?

Oh yes, they leave that stick, that guidance, there. It's more of a guidance, you know, this - they have a stick that they use and it generally has a red tip. They used to paint the tip of that stick, you know, and leave it there at the grave. That means they're finished, you know. That is they are finished putting the body away. It's put away nicely, you know, and. . . .

(Who makes the stick?)

Well a certain person. They ask a certain person, you know, to fix that for them. In morning, you know, when it's just daybreak, just when the sun is barely peeping up, why that's when they start finishing, you know, and they - whoever is going to bury - has charge of the body, why 'course he goes over there you know, and he talks to the person and if he has a fan, why of course, that is a wing, why he fans it off around, you know, like that and walks all around the casket that way, you know. That's an old-time habit, too, that they had and of course they don't do that now days. And then they talk, you know, this is our last day with them. But we hope that someday we will all be together again, you know. And he says a prayer and then he's finished, you know.

That is, he's through, and then of course when they close the casket, why then they take it out to the grave. So, of course, then he's praying all the time while they are doing that, you know. And when he takes it out to the grave, why then he's ready then. And so there - the ones that are to bury,
