

you speak of them as a group you refer to the same term neiəwuwu or neiəsəw.

(Bittle: So--can you use both of these words with the same group of people? It doesn't make any difference?)

Yeah. Yeah. Regardless of sex. It's a general term of brother and sisterhood.

(Note: -wuwu which forms the last portion of the term, neiəwuwu may mean "lodge" and the term may refer to persons raised in the same lodge. See Kroeber, Bulletin American Mus. of Natural History, Vol. 18, p. 154--he says -awu means "lodge, with his "a" seeming to correspond with the way I am using "w".--jj)
(There's another word you were telling me, too, I want to ask you to repeat it, and that's how a woman would refer to her husband?)

naebihi'iihaep Or, as a general term, you say naehae' -- "this one." That means "her man." Or "his wife." A man's wife.

(Bittle: Would you say the first one again?)

naebihi'iihaep --haep--H-A-B

(Bittle: That would mean that?)

"My old man."

(Bittle: Then what about the other one--the shorter one?)

naehae' naehae' That means "this one." "This one." Known that he's around as a husband. Her husband. That's one of the terms used by one of the--if he has plural wives. They all use that same one about him. That's one thing--the wives don't never call their husbands by name. Never.

(Is there any reason for that?)
