

Men put it on their shoulder, put them pots, you know, hang it on. Just lined up, you know, in good way, you know, lot of food, they take it over to the girl's people. And they're ready to receive it over there. The bridesmaids, the girls' sisters, cousins, they got it all figured it out over there. Then they receive that food and all rest of them relatives and they set that food on and they eat it. And these--when they take it over there they don't stay there. They just come back. Well, when they get through eating over there and clean up everything, pots. They take it back over there and they do that for at least, oh two or three days. Just put stuff on and leave it.

(Eat)

At noontime mostly, 'course the breakfast they cook for themselves. Well, then about the fourth day these horses goes along with the food. Take that food and all these others, horses. They give, you know, like relatives, They put in one or two. Oh, twenty or forty head of horses, you know. And these girl's family over there, they got it all figured out, too, whose gonna get these horses, you know. And on that side them girl's side, they bring dishes and blankets and stuff to help out, you know. Those dishes goes to the boy's family after everything is over with. Take that over there and they divide that over there, the boy's family do. But the horses, the girl's people they get all of that, and then in return they get the dishes and blankets, you know, and trunks. They take it over there the last day. They go on like that. And they get ready that one day way along in the evening they do that. And then they all get in a line on each side. Everybody takes part, lot of sightseers, too, you know there. And they dress up this way, the
