

knows and he will never tell. I know that he does say things over the tobacco, depending upon what kind of an ailment you have and what you are trying to have cured. And when he come back, he'll give you the tobacco, he'll tell you--usually they'll tell to you if it's cigarettes to smoke at least four a day and if you're chewing, you chew so many chews a day plus at night the last thing you do before you go to bed you chew some and you rub it on your chest over your heart. And this is supposed to help you. And they're very explicit about not telling anyone that you've gone to an Indian doctor. Usually the 'old timey' Indian doctors used to--there was not a definite set payment to give them, you gave them whatever you wanted to give them, but you always gave them something because there is a supersition if you do not give an Indian doctor something that what he is doing for you will come back on him and then he will become ill. In other words, you must return something from each to the other. But in modern day and time, they have got so they do charge a fee. Like Grandpa Blackfox used to charge $3.00, now he has gone up to $7.00. So, that's probably one reason they do not like for it to get out because, as you can see, if eleven or twelve people go per day, that runs into a little bit of money. So, today, actually, it seems as though that all we could really get out of Aunt Polly is that she is extremely concerned about this drama, The Trail of Tears, that is being put on by the Cherokee Historical Society down here in Tahlequah. She seems to be very concerned about that she said she had seen two or three flashes on television where they were advertising it and the Indians were all laughing and this is very disturbing to her because she had two or three ancestors that died on the Trail of Tears and when they were driven from North Carolina. And this morning she seemed to be very disturbed about all this and she more or less kept bringing the subject back up and she said some people had been there with a petition wanting to know if they wanted
