

Woman's voice: And that's where all the little Indians go and work out their problems. It's a worthwhile thing to go to.

Yeah, that's quite an organization they got.

(We're proud of our Osage lady.)

(Irrelevant conversation.)

(The Bureau, they are, I believe they are making more progress than they have been ever before.)

It seems that they are in recent years, you know.

(Irrelevant conversation.)

It's supposed to improve the image of the American Indian. And it looks into all phases of television and movie making you know, and publishing. I guess it's, it'll be doing an important work. It's designed to correct mistaken images and concepts of the Indian. Well, we know there are enough of those around, don't we? (Laughter)

(That is what we are trying to do. You know our people have, they have all, when we had, no it isn't like that today, when they discovered oil and they became wealthy, of course that was a generation back.)

Yeah.

(And it is not like that today. And all you hear about an Osage Indian is the decoration, you know, so Leonard and I, a chance to change that and that is what we have been really working hard on.)

Yeah.

(It isn't like that today and we're telling all the people about them.)

Yeah.

(I think that each tribe should do that.)

That's right, you should.

(Yeah, I think Mr. Belindo certainly is worthy of that position. (not clear) )
