

kind of slows them down at first and it takes them a little while to catch up. And so just gradually, finally they just drop out. Do you think some of that has anything to do with it? I mean, the clothes and the spending money and things like that?)

In some cases, I imagine it does. But I believe that mostly comes from families that a child has been growing up, hasn't been taught to appreciate what he has.

(Uh-huh.)

Because I know we were, we're hard up. We're not rich or anything like that. Two of my girls have gone through high school and everything. They didn't have the clothes that the other children had. And didn't have the money that the other children had. But I have talked to them and told them that it wasn't the clothes that counted, it's what they made of themselves that really counted in the long run. So they went through. But I think that's according to how the child is raised in the family.

(I think a lot of it then goes then back to the home life.)

Uh-huh. Yeah, it does.

(Well, now, your girls graduated from Sequoyah.)

Uh-huh. They went to the same school that I had gone to.

(Yeah. Kind of a family school. Well, thank-you very much for the interview this afternoon. Perhaps later I can talk to you again some time. Thank-you.)

HERB MEDICINE - BLACK SUMAC

(Well, Mrs. Adair, I was going to talk to you a little bit more this afternoon, and perhaps you can tell me a little bit about some herb medicine. You mentioned that you knew some remedies for certain ailments. I would really appreciate it if you could relate some of those to us.)
