

(How about rheumatism? Have you ever heard of any for rheumatism?)

Uh. No. I haven't heard just what they use. But I have seen the, after it's already been made. You know, something you rub on just like you do rubbing alcohol, or something like that.

(Uh-hum.)

Other than that, the only thing that I know that most of the Indians uses, this for rheumatism and different things like that. Just regular dry mustard, you know. Put in boiling water.

(Really?)

Uh-huh. And then you massage.

(Oh.)

The joints with that. Or you can take a towel and wet it as hot as you can stand it. You know, the water has to be as hot as you can stand it. And then put a towel in there and they wrap it around there, you know, where it hurt and all that.

ASHES FROM ELDERBERRY BUSH AND GRAPE VINES USED FOR DROPSY

(Uh-huh. Well, have you ever heard of any kind of herb or anything for Milk Leg?)

No, I haven't/

(Or dropsy?)

Yeah. I have dropsy. But it has to be, they use the limbs of the elderberry and grape vine for that.

(For dropsy?)

Uh-huh. For the dropsy. And you don't have to boil this. You have to burn these, you know, like the vines, the elderberry branches and then the vines. Well, they've got, seem like they've cut off into sections. You know, you notice they have little joints.

(Uh-huh. Have little joints, on them.)

You take from the top, count from the top down to seven on each of the vine in elderberry and then cut it off on the seventh knot. I
