

savage way of life and a new highly civilized way of life. Now, when we look at the Cherokees of this period, last week we called the Cherokee in his traditional loin cloth. We saw the Cherokee to wore the Iroquois scalp piece. But in this particular age, we are finding the Cherokee dress has changed considerably. What did the Cherokee in the Age of Sequoyah look like? Everyone wants to know what Sequoyah looked like. We have a new Sequoyah. We'll have a break later and these things will be here for you to look at. This is Charles Bank Wilson's Sequoyah. This hangs in the Oklahoma State Capitol. He did extensive research on it, and this is the Sequoyah that he produced. There are several Sequoyahs. This is the most famous of the Sequoyahs. This is the Charles Bird King portrait of Sequoyah. Now, one of the interesting things that we found out or have found out so far in our research of Sequoyah is that this isn't a picture of Sequoyah at all. Now, that was very shattering to me, to think that Sequoyah probably didn't look like this at all. But very strong historical evidence indicates that this was not done for the city of Sequoyah as people has always thought by King. But anyway, I don't know if you ever change. Sequoyah will probably always look this to most of us. But the Sequoyah--this is (not clear) had been made from this. It was a (not clear). Sequoyah, as you can see, is wearing costume considerably different than the Cherokees that we saw pictures last week. You remember the Cherokees who went to England to call the Father the King. So the Cherokees were changing. Their costumes were entirely different. The costumes of the Cherokees than the other period had worn. Let me give you a description of what the Cherokees' costumes of this particular period looked like. This is a description from Captain John Steward, History of the Cherokees and Choctaws: "The Cherokees at present"--this is in 1834--"wear but very
