

Well, maybe opportunity has come before them, but maybe they've turned it down for an easier way of life.

(Perhaps they didn't have the confidence to ask for the opportunity?)

That's what I want to stress most among the Indian youth. A responsibility brings confidence. That's why I feel that relocation is beneficial to the Indian. Once he can get on his own and realize responsibility in himself, well, he'll gain confidence and security within himself.

(Do you think possibly building a positive self-image among the young Indians people will probably do a lot for them? I mean maybe through sports. Through something where they can excel. And where they can have some little achievement gradually build up their self-confidence.)

Well every--every person is different. That's not include Indians, you know. But this is something that youth--

(Well, that applies to poor whites, too.)

Well, that's why I say it does not include the Indians. You saying something like this because this. If they want to excel in something, well, they can. They know they can excel. You've heard of Indians saying, "I should make All Star." Because I think he really wants to think that. And he really he thinks something like that. He has a real good reason for thinking that way. And lot of times he's left out in the cold because who wants to have an Indian as being a leader of an all white team.

(Why shouldn't they want to?)

Well, all right. This is part of the Indian. That's what he wants to know. Why shouldn't they select him as being the leader of the whole group? See what I mean?

(Do you feel like there might be some white people on the team that might not want this?)
