

if you married him," the parents advised their young ladies. The young ladies wouldn't believe that. They disliked the Crane. He went by every day carrying his fish; but the Crane always gave the parents some fish. Sometime later, the Hummingbird married the prettiest one young lady. After they were married, they were remained in their house. All the time, they fought. The Crane had also asked for the hand of the beautiful daughter, but had been refused. "You are so ugly. You're not a suitable man," the young woman had told her friend. That was at the time the Hummingbird had asked to marry her. After the Hummingbird did marry her, they fought in the house all the time. The young women kept admiring the handsome one. Then, one day, the beautiful young woman became hungry, but the Hummingbird had never thought of getting food. She said, "You don't think about anything except your looks. I'm going to leave you." She left the Hummingbird and went over to the Crane's house. When she arrived there, she said to the Crane, "I have decided that you can have me. Let's get married, and we can eat together then, because you are the only one who knows how to get food. I see you carry your food by every day." The Crane said, "But I tried to marry you once, and you rejected me. It would be better for you to go back to the Hummingbird." That's the reason why the Hummingbird and the Crane are not friends. They say that they do not fly together. It is said that the Hummingbird will peck the neck of the Crane when he finds him in his nesting place. They said that the Hummingbird does not like for him to come around, and that they always have a fight. That's it." (laughter) So, you see, there are some differences in the stories. Here is a story about a Crayfish and the Fox had a race,
